NEW QUESTION: 1
Which of the following would be used to implement Mandatory Access Control (MAC)?
A. Role-based access control
B. Clark-Wilson Access Control
C. Lattice-based access control
D. User dictated access control
Answer: C
Explanation:
Explanation/Reference:
Explanation:
A lattice is a mathematical construct that is built upon the notion of a group. The most common definition of the lattice model is "a structure consisting of a finite partially ordered set together with least upper and greatest lower bound operators on the set."

Two methods are commonly used for applying mandatory access control:
Rule-based (or label-based) access control: This type of control further defines specific conditions for access to a requested object. A Mandatory Access Control system implements a simple form of rule- based access control to determine whether access should be granted or denied by matching:

- An object's sensitivity label
- A subject's sensitivity label
Lattice-based access control: These can be used for complex access control decisions involving multiple objects and/or subjects. A lattice model is a mathematical structure that defines greatest lower- bound and least upper-bound values for a pair of elements, such as a subject and an object.

Incorrect Answers:
A: Clark-Wilson Access Control is not used to implement Mandatory Access Control (MAC).
B: Role-based Access Control is not used to implement Mandatory Access Control (MAC).
D: User dictated Access Control is not used to implement Mandatory Access Control (MAC).
