NEW QUESTION: 2

You designed a database for patient records as a pilot project to cover a few hundred patients in three clinics.

Your design used a single database table to represent all patients and their visits, and you used self-joins to generate reports. The server resource utilization was at 50%. Since then, the scope of the project has expanded. The database must now store 100 times more patient records. You can no longer run the reports, because they either take too long or they encounter errors with insufficient compute resources. How should you adjust the database design?

- A. Shard the tables into smaller ones based on date ranges, and only generate reports with prespecified date ranges.
- B. Add capacity (memory and disk space) to the database server by the order of 200.
- C. Partition the table into smaller tables, with one for each clinic. Run queries against the smaller table pairs, and use unions for consolidated reports.
- D. Normalize the master patient-record table into the patient table and the visits table, and create other necessary tables to avoid self-join.

Answer: A

NEW QUESTION: 3

An organization is using a hybrid cloud for services. Services are designed to use Load Balancers. Orchestration workflows are designed so that services instances are placed in multiple fault domains. Why are services designed in such a manner?

- A. Mitigate risk to service availability
- B. Minimize impact of governance policies
- C. Mitigate risk to service integrity
- D. Minimize impact of security breach

Answer: B

NEW QUESTION: 4

In a new DMVPN deployment, phase 1 completes successfully. However, phase 2 experiences issues.

Which troubleshooting step is valid in this situation?

- A. Ensure that the nodes use the same authentication method.
- B. Remove NHRP configuration and reset the tunnels.
- C. Verify IP routing between the external IPs of the two peers is correct.
- D. Temporarily remove encryption to check if the GRE tunnel is working.
